b) Economics

In the four years 1938-1941 I completed an Economics degree at Sydney University. These studies, as Andrew Wells observes, gave me a broad understanding of economy and society and also of European economic history. In retrospect the most lasting influences were Adam Smith, the Marxist based works of Roll and Dobb and Joan Robinson on full employment.

Part II Left Book Club

For ten years from 1936 the Left Book Club was the most persuasive and powerful force for left wing views in the English speaking world, Gollan in Revolutionaries and Reformists cites several histories of the Club and discusses its influence in Australia. Founded in London in 1936, it was started by radical publisher Victor Gollancz providing cheap editions of works opposing fascism, appeasement, the threat of war and the current economic and social inquisition. The Spanish Civil War gave impetus to the Club, which grew during the Second World War and the debates about post-war reconstruction. Gollan says that the Club was stronger in Australia than in any other country outside Britain.

From 1936 to 1948 the Club published 257 books. There was a monthly choice which went to all members and many additional books available for purchase. The Club was also, in Australia as in Britain, a political movement running discussion groups, a newsletter and lecture tours. Gollan says that the Club in Australia had a maximum of 4,000 members after Munich (1938) and produced an Australian Left News with local application. It had a significant influence on opinion and politics.

Most of the books dealt with international relations and economic policy, but they ranged widely in world affairs, including European imperialism and national liberation movements in Africa, India and China which subsequently achieved political power. Amongst the books are many classics of their time.

In 1940 I was working as a junior clerk in the Commonwealth Customs Department in Sydney, attracted to left wing and radical ideas. The impact of the Depression, still apparent, the rise of Fascism in Europe, the drift to war, sharpened these opinions. I sought to obtain left wing publications when I could, buying the Communist Party Tribune from a street seller at Wynyard railway station and seeking some of the publications which it mention, if I could afford them.

That year I had a windfall. Goods brought into Australia under customs bond had to remain under customs supervision until duty was paid or they were otherwise disposed of. Any importer who wanted to use the goods in manufacture had to pay for a customs officer to be in attendance whilst the goods were treated. This "merchants overtime" paid by the importer was a welcome perk for the improvising customs officer. It did not often come the way of lowly junior like me, but once I was given an "all nighter", sitting up all night in a factory, nominally verifying that dutiable goods were used for manufacture, and being paid for this twelve hour shift about as much as my normal weekly wage.

On payday I went to the Workers Educational Association (WEA) bookshop in Macquarie Place, near the Customs House. I took out a subscription to the Left Book Club, bought many of the back numbers which attracted me and carried them off the start my own political library. During the war years I kept up my Left Book Club subscription even as a "six bob a day" soldier and bought extra issues on air crew pay.
